Panelist had the chance to discuss the following questions;

Conversation: There is an increasing sense of optimism for the future, purpose about the present, and pride of the past achievements among the people of Africa that is fueling a hunger to make speedier and better decisions. What are the cultural barriers for international partnership?

Conversation: At a time when the international community is discussing future development in Africa, all efforts are focused on putting culture at the heart of the development. What are the key areas where culture can play a decisive role in the sustainable development in Africa?

Conversation: The Africa continent is enjoying a demographic dividend, with the majority of its people being under 25, while life expectancy is also improving. This makes it a young and dynamic continent full of possibilities for its youth that can bring new ideas and bundle them with lessons from the wisdom of the older generation. How to engage young African leaders to promote inclusive sustainable development and gain a better future for Africa's next generation?

Conversation: How do we foster dialogue that promotes the exchange of ideas and innovative thinking among African policymakers to encourage and enhance research on economic and policy issues related to the development of African economies?

Conversation: According to Africa Investor, family offices and high-net-worth-individuals portfolio allocations to frontier markets are typically only around 5% but they are rising as wealthy families are turning to frontier markets for new growth opportunities and revenues to help compensate for sluggish or no growth in developed economies. How Africa can diversify its economy toward the sector that creates job?

Conversation: How to create opportunities for young Africans in the Diaspora to disseminate their findings as well as share information with African policymakers on the work they do in the region?
